“The Power Outage”

Still to be done, a few last Sunday night chores; washed clothes to be folded and put away, trash to go out. Simple doingness, the respite of tasks. Bats are grazing fields of air, a hoot owl calls in the back woods. Visible from an upstairs window, the cloud-caught glow of an end-of-summer carnival goes suddenly black as all else. Must be children stuck on the Ferris wheel. My palms slide down banisters to the candle drawer. Nothing to do but go to bed. The world is as dark as it ever was. Wind is awash in the music of trees. We rest in one another's arms but there's no spark between us tonight, nothing to kindle, so I voice a memory and you voice another, and we go back and forth like this, surveying in deep enclosing darkness, the turns circumstance and promise have given us. We seem to be drifting together everywhere and nowhere at once, then the old impression of eternity sneaks up, that vivid mercurial feeling of before-and-now-and-again-and yes love, you, and yes love, me-somehow, forever, we're sure of it. Or perhaps this is only human, unable as we are to imagine not being, or an end to our love, the sense of a saving, needed haven, when light has failed and we're in the dark.

© 2002 Gray Jacobik from Brave Disguises